

Pleasanton Reliability

We've heard a lot of feedback and concerns from customers about, you know, recent reliability performance over the last few years.

We put together a plan.

We made a commitment to the city of Pleasanton to improve local reliability, and we're here following through on that commitment.

The PG&E team has been very good at keeping us apprised of how they've accelerated their capital projects.

We know they have to go through the CPUC process, which isn't something that we deal with very regularly.

And so the partnership for their communication to let us know that they were advancing projects before we started to see shovel in the ground really helped us then turn around and communicate to our community and residents that work was happening, even though they may not have seen it.

We're installing a brand new switch, so brand new piece of equipment, shiny and new.

This, combined with all of the other jobs that we're doing, should lead to shorter, fewer and smaller outages going forward.

I appreciate the partnership and I'm sure our residents will appreciate their air conditioners working this summer.

So thank you so much.
